The condition of the rocks forbears the theory that it is a case of suicide, or acci-The rocks overhead are not sufticiently high to make it possible for a fall to have resulted fatally. While the canan is deep, the sides slope on gradually and a fall could not have been had,

The most likely theory is that the sololer was either waylaid, and in the fight which followed, both the assailant and assailed were killed. Some of the party, among the number, think that the soldier may have been waylaid by a number of Indians and massacred. A pistol was found near the soldier, and while the stock had decayed, the chambers were empty, all having been discharged.

It is impossible to tell how long the bodies have been there. Months certainly have claused since the double death | building of the town nd it is more than likely that the full particulars will never be known. Over at the fort, once lif a while a soldier leaves, and it is thought that he has deserted It is possible that this soldier may have wandered out in the mountains and have been waylaid. Or it may have been a mutual fight.

The entire matter, it is understood, will be referred to the sheriff, and some light may be thrown upon the matter. The skull of the soldier, it might be remarked was crushed, as if struck by
